An economist, a physicist, and a mathematician are driving through Scotland? They see a brown cow out of the window, and the economist says, 'Fascinating that the cows in Scotland are brown.' The physicist says, 'I'm afraid you're over-generalizing from the evidence. All we know is that some cows in Scotland are brown.' Finally, the mathematician shakes his head at both of them. 'Wrong again. Completely unwarranted by the evidence. All we can infer, logically, is that there exists at least one cow in this country, at least one side of which is brown.'
